

Catherine Bracy

CEO & Co-Founder, Tech Equity Collaborative

Catherine Bracy is a civic technologist and community organizer whose work focuses on the intersection of technology and political and economic inequality. She is the Founder and CEO of TechEquity Collaborative, an organization that mobilizes tech workers and companies to advocate for economic equity in our communities.

She was previously Code for America's Senior Director of Partnerships and Ecosystem where she grew Code for America's Brigade program into a network of over 50,000 civic tech volunteers in 80+ cities across the US. She also founded Code for All, the global network of Code-for organizations with partners on six continents. Catherine built Code for America's civic engagement focus area, creating a framework and best practices for local governments to increase public participation which has been adopted in cities across the US.

During the 2012 election cycle she was Director of Obama for America's Technology Field Office in San Francisco, the first of its kind in American political history. She was responsible for organizing technologists to volunteer their skills for the campaign's technology and digital efforts. Prior to joining the Obama campaign, she was the administrative director at Harvard's Berkman Center for Internet & Society. She is on the board of directors at the Data & Society Research Institute and the Turner Housing Lab.
